Text 2: Read this text about traditional Scottish food and do the activities that follow.

Haggis

Haggis is Scotland's national dish and although it's an object of Scottish culinary fascination around the world, it certainly is not a beauty queen. But what haggis lacks in appearance it certainly makes up in its taste! Intrigued yet?

This enduringly popular dish is a type of savoury pudding that combines meat with oatmeal, onions, salt and spices.

Often served with the classic sides of «bashed neeps and mashed tatties» (that's Scots for turnip and potatoes), haggis is traditionally cooked in a sheep's stomach (a historic way of preserving meat), although most haggis nowadays is sold and cooked in a synthetic sausage casing. We agree that it may not win the title of the most elegant dish on the planet, but it really is undeniably delicious! Need more convincing?

This versatile food is also used as a focal ingredient in more contemporary dishes in the restaurants and pubs across Scotland. From traditional haggis with whisky sauce to modern dishes with a twist, like haggis Scotch quail's eggs, haggis-topped nachos or the excellent Balmoral Chicken, (which is a succulent chicken breast stuffed with spicy haggis and wrapped in sizzling bacon), haggis is favoured year-round in Scotland and beyond.

Vegetarian haggis is just as tasty too. It's packed with oatmeal, lentils, nuts, kidney beans, onions and spices and is enjoyed by vegetarians and non-vegetarians alike!

As strange as haggis may sound, the end result is a culinary masterpiece. You can buy haggis in many places around Scotland, from local butchers to independent retailers, large supermarkets and farms shops, or you can order it online.
